

Subjective Communication: A New Training Method

William H Plaisted Jr.

M.S. in Healthcare Management

2021

Granite State College

Aim of Project

- To expose the stigma of traditional communication in the healthcare industry
- The healthcare industry is “black and white” but the way we communicate with subordinates should be open for subjectivity.
- People come from different backgrounds, cultures, generations, experiences, and upbringing. We as leaders must keep this in mind and use it as an advantage by communicating more effectively.

Background

- Lack of communication is the “silent killer” of the healthcare field
- Properly communicating with team members will improve team relationships
- Team members will feel more valued if their conversations with leaders are more individualized and unique, rather than generic
- Communicating effectively will ultimately improve the patient experience and increase the patient quality of care.

Results

- After implementing this new method, the results were staggering.
- My team has become more cohesive and receptive to any questions or concerns that arise
- These results made it possible to come up with the acronym, T.E.A.M
- T- Test/Trial
- E- Evaluate
- A- Assess
- M- Manage